A riot of color, memory, and becoming

Test school

This poem explores Holi not just as a festival of colors, but as a radical reset of the human spirit. Through imagery of pigments, fire, laughter, and forgiveness, it reflects on how Holi dissolves ego, hierarchy, and silence—repainting individuals into a shared canvas of joy. v2hgjfju

Morning breaks like a whispered secret and the streets of India wake in technicolor.

A quiet sky stretches —
blank, innocent, waiting.

Then someone laughs.
A fist of ????? rises.
And suddenly, the air learns how to fly.

Pink explodes into possibility.
Blue clings to collars like unfinished dreams.
Yellow crowns strangers into royalty.
Green slips between fingers like forgiven mistakes.

In the lanes of Mathura,
echoes of Krishna still tease the wind,
coloring love mischievous,
coloring devotion bold.

Water guns pulse like playful rebellion.
Drums refuse silence.
Every rooftop becomes a revolution.

Yesterday's grudges blur.
Titles wash away.
The CEO, the shopkeeper, the child—
all rendered equally ridiculous in neon joy.

And somewhere in the smoke of Holika Dahan,
old fears burn quietly,
crackling like expired versions of ourselves.

By evening, the mirror does not recognize us.

But maybe that's the point.

Holi is not about color.
It is about surrender.
About letting the world redraw you
in shades you were too afraid to wear.

And as the sun sets,
skin stained and spirit louder, we realize—

we were never meant to stay one color anyway.

Analysis/Reflection

Holi symbolizes dissolution—of ego, resentment, and rigid identity. The poem uses color as metaphor for transformation, equality, and emotional exposure. The burning ritual of Holika Dahan represents psychological cleansing, while Krishna's playful association highlights love beyond social norms. Ultimately, Holi becomes a metaphor for radical authenticity and shared humanity.
